Teas by George Cannon, Paris

There are many theories regards the history of tea, yet we know that from the 6th century in China, tea is mentioned in various historical documents. From this we note that during that period tea was already cultivated and widely consumed. During the period of the three dynasties (Tang, Song & Ming) drinking tea became fashionable, so much so, it spread to Japan and Korea.

In Japan, the awareness of tea is linked to the religion of Buddhism which derives from India. At the beginning of the 9th century, monks learned to drink tea to keep them awake during their meditation sessions and from there they began to cultivate it near their monasteries. Tea which was originally imported in the West by the Dutch and then the English from China was actually green tea. One wonders then, how it came that the black tea took off in the West. The reason is that tea was transported by clipper to London and fermented during the long journey.

The tea would depart being green and arrive oxidised. So, people added sugar and milk to it to hide the astringent taste of it and consequently it took off. Towards the second half of the eighteenth century there was an agricultural crisis in Ceylon and so consequently the English began to plant tea on a mass scale. The result was extraordinary – in just a few years the tea produced there was enough to provide the whole of the West with black tea which quickly became widespread.

So, due to the political situation and distance from China green tea was almost 'forgotten' by the Westerners and only in the last few years are we rediscovering it.

Our tea list showcases the green teas with their original flavours, as well as some excellent black teas. Green teas are not only an excellent accompaniment with food but are also refreshing and healthy

Coffee by Monmouth, London

Monmouth Coffee first starting roasting and retailing coffee from their basement on Monmouth Street Covent Garden in 1978. Our organic coffee is a rich blend of Brazilian, Colombian and Peruvian beans giving full and sweet flavours, ruity length and a cocoa aftertaste. We roast coffee from single farms, estates and cooperatives. When we taste a coffee that we like, we want to know where it comes from and who grows, picks and processes it. We travel extensively throughout the year, visiting the producers and cooperatives with whom we currently work and looking for interesting varieties of coffee and new farms from which to buy.

During these visits we talk to farmers and cooperative members, learning more about the coffee they grow and process and the challenges that they face. We then look to establish a relationship with the grower and exporter of that coffee. We believe that where such a relationship exists, quality, quantity and price requirements can be discussed in an open and equal way. We see this as sustainable, fair and equal trade.
